Session Description: While many disciplinary traditions take a systematic approach toward connecting patterns of urban land use to socio-economic processes, there is a growing need and ability to consider spatial effects in an empirical setting. Recognizing that observed spatial patterns and distributions of socio-economic phenomena are shaped by the continuous location and behavioral decisions made by residents, businesses, developers, and policy makers, this session aims to bring together papers from a variety of disciplinary perspectives and from an array of spatial scales that together can help further our understanding of social and economic processes that shape intra-urban dynamics.
